

From the Editors' Desk:

This is the second issue of the current volume which is supposed to be published within the month of June. But due to various technical problems in our website emerged out from some uncalled for incident, we were forced to reconstruct the webpage of the previous issue. As the University examination process swung into full fledged mode just after that, we had no other option but to wait for another month or so. Anyway this issue is being published as the June issue though it is formally launched just prior to the Nagasaki day.

This issue consists of six articles covering three categories of our journal namely: brief reports of original research work, review on current frontiers or historical milestones and the interface — science, environment and society. We hope it will satisfy the intellectual appetite of our growing audience in this delayed monsoon.